“Turmeric is an embodiment of intelligence.” - Sayer Ji

Turmeric & Curcumin

What is the relationship between turmeric and curcumin?

- Turmeric is a spice from the root of the Curcuma longa plant.
- Turmeric contains curcumin, a substance with over 100 pharmacological actions, including powerful antioxidant and anti-inflammatory properties.
- Curcumin makes up approximately 2-5% of the dried weight in turmeric.
- For a more potent dose, curcumin can be taken directly. Look for 95% concentration.
- For best absorption it's important to take turmeric or curcumin with black pepper, or for it to be combined with fats and/or lecithin.

The Most Common Forms of Turmeric

Turmeric can be used in a variety of forms both internally and externally. You can buy it in root form, powder, as a supplement or as a lotion to be used on the face and skin.

Daily Dosage of Turmeric

How much turmeric should you consume to retain the health benefits? Here are a few helpful tips to get you started.

- Sayer uses 1/2 - 1.5 teaspoons per day of the dried root powder, certified organic.
- A typical dose of supplemental curcumin is about 250mg per day, and often increased when dealing with a condition.
- Many find benefit to taking 400-600 mg of turmeric extract in pill form up to three times a day or as suggested by the label.
- Look for a supplement that is paired with black pepper to aid in absorption, or add black pepper with turmeric in culinary use.
- Try and get a product standardized for 95% curcuminoids. For enhanced absorption find one that is also phospholipid-bound or lecithinized.
